The South Island, though less populated, is the larger of the two major islands of New Zealand. It is full of breathtaking natural sceneries. The variety of its geological repertoire is astonishing; from mighty glaciers to subtropical rainforest, snow-capped mountain to sandy beaches; alpine passes to serene lakes, beautiful fjords to fertile plains, mysterious caves to friendly coastal towns, the opportunity for enjoying the great nature and adventure are endless.

Dunedin is located at the southern end of the Otago Peninsula, it still retains many influences from the Scottish immigrants who found the city in 1848. The city's name was derived from the word Dineiden, the Gaelic name for Edinburgh. The city prospered during the gold rush in the 1860s, the wealth was reflected in its ornate Gothic style buildings. Dunedin also became a city of firsts - establishing the country's first university, medical college, electric tram and cable car system, wool mill and daily newspaper. Much of the wealth gradually drifted to the North Island, but the cultural legacy makes Dunedin a characterful city. Dunedin's other assets are the world's only mainland colony of royal albatross and a colony of hoiho, the world's rarest yellow-eye penguin.

Queenstown, mirrored in Lake Waikaitipu's placid surface against a backdrop of massive snow-capped mountain range, is New Zealand's ultimate picturesque resort area. It offers a variety of thrilling outdoor adventures such as white water rafting, parapenting, tandem parachuting, river surfing, cross country or glacier skiing and of course, bungee jumping. Queenstown is the birthplace of bungee jumping and the first original commercial jump site is at the Kawarau Bridge. Downtown Queenstown is friendly with superb dining establishments and shopping venues.

Christchurch is the largest city in the South Island, is the old capital of anglicized New Zealand. Dotted with 19th century neo-Gothic architectures and parks, with the Avon river floats serenely through the town center, the city has its unique character. It was a planned Anglican settlement orchestrated by a devout English Tory, John Robert Godley, who created the Canterbury Association. The city's Anglican ideals reflected by its many impressive public buildings and home steads. The public-spiritedness bequeathed by Christchurch's founders means that a third of the city is a garden, park or nature reserve. In addition, there are many sophisticated and hip restaurants and cafes, making a visit to the city more enjoyable.
